As a nation embedded in the heart of Central Asia, Uzbekistan has a rich tapestry of traditions, customs, and sociopolitical influences that have shaped the experiences of its people in relation to gender and sexuality.

This guide has been carefully curated to serve as a valuable tool for scholars, students, researchers, activists, and anyone keen to explore the intricate dynamics of gender and sexuality within Uzbekistan. International non-governmental organizations (INGOs)

International non-governmental organizations (INGOs) typically bring a global and comparative perspective to the data and information they collect, often providing standardized reporting across countries. INGOs can be good sources of numeric data at the country-level but may be lacking in local points of view and distinctive local voices and detail (such as provincial or city level data). Other INGOs take a more focused and activist perspective on specific issues.

This page includes:

• UN Population Fund in Kazakhstan

• World Economic Forum's Global Gender Gap Report

• Spotlight Initiative Regional Programme for Central Asia and Afghanistan

Local non-governmental organizations (Local NGOs)

For information on issues that often go unrecognized in official state media and governmental sources, such as feminist activism and LGBTQ+ topics, local NGOs can fill in the gaps. These sources are often activist and organized around specific issues and groups.

This page includes:

• Feminita, a grassroots queer feminist collective

• Karfen, the grassroots feminist organization

Government

Governmental resources provide many official data series and sources of official government laws and pronouncements, often in great detail, but may lack in coverage of underrepresented groups or controversial issues. Typically the government is the only organization that has the resources and authority to compile widespread participation in data and information collection for efforts such as a National Census and other large-scale initiatives. At the same time, the government's official profile may discourage data collection and respondent participation about a wide range of topics such as views and behavior relating to politics, religion, sexual and gender expression, ethnic identity, and more.
